n Cy In the North of England there is a custom used at or about this time [Christmas] . . The Fool Plough goes about, a pageant that consists of a number of sword dancers dragging a plough, with music, and one, sometimes two, in very strange attire, the Bessy, in the giotesque habit of an old woman, and the fool, almost covered with skins, a hairy cap on, and the tail of some animal hanging from his back, Brand Pop Antiq (ed. 1813) I 396-7; N Cy. This custom is of very ancient origin, derived from the Feast of Fools. Nhb 1 Anciently the hinds and agricultural labourers of Northumberland used to celebrate the termination of the labours of the plough by a pageant, which is variously called the white-plough, stot-plough, full-plough, and fool-plough or fond-plough The men who joined were dressed in white shirts (without coat or waistcoat), on which were stitched a profusion of coloured ribbons and rosettes. They yoked themselves to a plough, and went round the country-side preceded by a flag-bearer and accompanied by a man with a gun At each house a fee was demanded, and when a gift was obtained the gun was fired A refusal of the customary largess was followed by the plough being drawn in many furrows through the ground or pavement in front of the house.

Hence Foot-it, sb. a boys' game; see below. Cf 2. (1, 2).

Glo. A game similar to leap trog. Any number of boys play, and one is 'creeved' by 'lie Bire' to go down, i. e. to be leaped over. The leapers start from a line The last boy to go over calls 'Foot-it' as he goes over; if he fails to do so he goes down If the calls, the boy who is down places (1 the left foot parallel to the line, (2) places the heel of the right foot against the waist of the left, (3) then carries the left foot at right angles to the right, and then (4) left foot parallel to that. The object of the best leaper is to leap over the back from as great a distance as possible The boy who fails to jump has to 'go down' (SSB). Lon. After all the boys had jumped over the first boy's back, a cry of 'Foott' was raised, and the boy who had given the back placed one of his feet at a right angle to the other, and in this way measured a 'foot's length' from the starting place. All the boys then 'overed' his back from the original line, the last one crying 'foot it'. The game continued in the same manner until one of the boys failed to 'over' the back, when he became 'Back,' GOMME Games (1894) 134.

It was not long ago the standing dish in these country parts at feast-time, but is now almost obs. On the rustic tongue it is gen. 'thrumaty' (J P K). Lin. On the Wolds, the farmers always provide 'frummaty' for breakfast at the 'clippins' (sheep shearings). The 'frummaty' was made thus: a quantity of the finest wheat was steeped in water for about 12 hours. It was then put into a clean sack and a strong man took hold of each end of it and twisted it up a little, leaving the wheat a rather loose heap in the middle; they then swung the sack round and up in the air, and brought it down with a hard bang on the kitchen floor ... until the outer husk or bran was loosened. It was then taken out of the sack, spread even on a cloth on the kitchen table and rubbed with another cloth, and put into a large vessel of water, to separate the bran; it was then ready for 'creeing,' that is for slowly boiling, until each corn of wheat was soft and swollen to twice its natural size. It was then ready for being made into 'frummaty,' which was done by again boiling with milk, raisins, currents, nutmeg, and spice. .. It was usual to give it, in almost unlimited quantities, to the families of all the labourers on the farm, to all the poor old women in the village, &c., N & Q. (1875) 5th S. 11 295 n.Lin. (1) The figure of the Furry-dance . . . is extremely simple. The first half of the tune the couples dance along hand-in-hand; at the second the first gentleman turns the second lady and the second gentleman the first. The change is made all down the set, Flk-Lore Jrn. (1886) IV 232; There is a legend that a fiery dragon passed over the town without doing any harm and the Furry dance is in commemoration of this. . The dancers... walked two and two, the gentleman leading the lady with his right hand... They trip along a few steps, then the gentleman in the first couple takes the lady in the second with both hands and turns her round, her partner taking the lady in the first couple in the same way; then they take their own partners again, and so on... All the gentlemen's houses were left open and the proso on. . All the gentlemen's houses were left open and the procession danced through and round the garden. . GABEL-RENT, sb. Obs. Chs. An ancient customary tenure of land at Chester.

Chs. In the Domesday Book of Cheshire and Lancashire, as edited by Mr. W. Beamont, we have the very earliest existing reference to this curious and accustomed tenure at Chester: 'Whoso did not pay his gabel (i.e, not only the annual reserved rent, but also the peculiar service due to the king, or other superior authority, at the time appointed, Christmas), forfeited "x shillings." But if he was unwilling or unable to pay or perform it, the praefect or sheriff took his land into the king's hand. . . . It is only within our own day that, for a mere mess of pottage, the city has bartered away for ever this ancient and picturesque custom, involving the original title to the soil of rare old Chester, Cheshire Sheaf, I. 355.

Gable, gablum in ancient records is an old word that signifies a rent, duty, custome, or service yielded or done to the King or any other Lord, Termes de la Ley (1671). Fr. gabelle, any kind of impost (Cotgr.); MLat. gabella,

A yelping sound heard at night, resembling the sound made by a pack of hounds, but probably caused by flocks of wild geese; see below. Cf. Gabriel('s hounds.

n.Cy. Birds which make a noise in the air in the spring evenings, GROSE (1790). n.Yks 'Gabble-ratchet' . . . A name for a yelping sound at night, like the cry of hounds, Atkinson Moorl Parish (1891) 70; n.Yks¹ A name for a yelping sound heard at night, more or less resembling the cry of hounds or yelping of dogs, probably due to flocks of wild geese which chance to be flying by probably due to flocks of wild geese which charice to be hying by night, and taken as an omen or warning of approaching death to the hearer or some one connected with him. Another notion in Clevel, couples with the name the figure of a mysterious bird, with large glowing eyes, hooked beak, and an awful shriek, which appears to, accompanies, or is heard by the death-doomed. another tradition yet current in Clevel, is that the Gabriel-ratchet originates in the ill deed of a gentleman who once lived in the district, and who was so inordinately fond of the pleasures of the chase, and so jealous about the hounds who had ministered to them, that, on his deathbed, he gave orders they should all be killed and buried with him, that no one else should benefit by them as he himself would be no longer able w.Yks Beings who come around the house of a dying person, to chatter and laugh My landlady says (1897) she has heard them twice, each time the night before a death (L.M.S.); About Leeds it [a rushing sound in the air] is there called 'Gabble retchet,' and is held to be the souls of unbaptized children doomed to fit restlessly around their parents' abode, Henderson Flk-Lore (1879) iv, The gabbleratch, that imaginary being of our ancestors' creation, takes a prominent place in the rural life of thirty years ago. Scores are living amongst us now who at one time had a belief in this unlucky bird, whose shrieking cry in the dead of night, has been a frequent warning of some death to be expected. . Any or all of these noises . . . have been each in their time the fatal gabble atch or gabbleratchet, Binns Vill. to Town (1882) 79; Theare wor sooin a noise it hoyle, as if it hed been full ov gabble-ratches, Dewsbre Olm. (1865) 8; The poor gabble or gaber-rachet is a child with the presumed tie of sin undissolved, Hamilton Nugae Lit (1841) 551; HUTTON Tour to Caves (1781); w.Yks. Called by some inght-whistlers, birds which fly overhead in the night, and are considered to be forewarners of death. There is an opinion that considered to be forewarners of death. There is an opinion that these birds are at least of two distinct kinds. The 'night-whistlers' are birds high in the air, passing by, but of doubtful race; they have, however, a perfect whistle. The 'gabbleratches,' on the other hand, are said to frequent damp places, and their cry is a sort of gabble like that of the magpie. A mother . . said to her children, wishing to keep them within-doors, 'Yo'll be hearin' gabbleratches some o' these neets, and then yo'll stop i' th' haas' About Leeds 'gabbleratches' are believed to be the restless souls of children, who have died unbaptized; w.Yks 5 They congregate and pass singuage, over the house or neighbourhood, in the and pass, singing, over the house or neighbourhood, in the night-time, where a death may be looked for, the noise made by them is more like the noise made by a litter of young whelps in the absence of the dame, when they don't happen to be asleep Lan. These spectre hounds are locally termed 'Gabriel Ratchets,' and are supposed to foretell death or misfortune to all who hear their sound, Gent. Mag. (Apr. 1880) 493, Gabriel Raches are supposed to be something like litters of puppies yelping in the air, HARLAND & WILKINSON Flk-Lore (1867) 167.

Tales, 82; n.Yks.<sup>2</sup> The flocks of yelping wild geese high in the air, migrating southward in the twilight evenings of autumn, their being more audible than the assemblage is visible. As the foreboders of evil, people close their ears and cover their eyes until the phalanx has passed over. They stand connected with the Northman's Legend of the Spectral Hunt w.Yks 2 'Gabriel's whelps' is sometimes used. Stf. At Wednesbury, the colliers going to their pits early in the morning hear the noise of a pack of hounds in the air, to which they give the name of Gabriel's Hounds, though the more sober and judicious take them only to be wild geese making this noise in their flight (K). Der. There's the boggat .. and Gabriel's hounds was heard t'other night i' th' air . . . as comes when folk is nigh to death, Verney Stone Edge (1868) xvii, 'Gabriel' is condemned to follow his hounds at night, high in the upper air, till doomsday, for having hunted on Sunday, ib. note. nw.Der.1

GAFF,  $sb.^5$  and  $v.^3$  n.Cy. 1. sb. One of the players in the game of 'pitch and toss.' See below.

Gaff is a term used in the game of 'Pitch and Toss.' The player who wins at the pitch is thereby entitled to act as 'gaff.' He thereupon proceeds to pick up the pennies and laying them three at a time in a row upon the fingers of his right hand he tosses them up so that they spin in the air. The 'heads' that fall after each toss become his perquisite. The tails are taken charge of by the player who laid second from the 'mot,' and when all have been tossed he in turn tosses the tails over again, heads again becoming the property of the tosser and tails passing to the third man and so on. When the coins have all been thus apportioned the 'gaff' chooses a 'past' from which to pitch at the 'mot' again (R.O H.).

2. In the Forest of Dean: a licence or grant of land, with the right to dig for coal, iron, &c.; a mine so granted or licensed

Glo. N. & Q. (1874) 5th S 11. 368; Glo 1 Before the regulation in 1841, a free-miner often tried to work his own gale, but could only do so to a very small extent, as he soon found money and machinery and labour were required, which his means could not meet. No free-miner can now work his own gale. Hence the introduction of companies, who purchased the gales, and sunk for coal. Gales meant any appointment made by the Crown to a miner or company who asked for them. The gale was large or small, according to the application. It might include acres of coal seams, or only a part of an acre. It could take in the upper seams only, or the middle only, or the lower, or all three. The gale may be for iron or stone, as well as for coal So long as the galeage is paid up annually to the Crown, there is no interference on the part of the Crown; but many gales both of iron and stone now fall in to the Crown, through the failure to pay the ground-rent

3. A boundary or mark of division between 'gales.'

Glo. This is perhaps the commonest term used in the Forest in connection with mines, and constant lawsuits arise from the habit of trespassing beyond the bounds, or of letting water overflow into other workings.

in the river Dee

Kcd Two places on the Dee near Maryculter House are called by the older inhabitants 'the garths' These are shallows that might be used on occasion as fords In flood the rivers throw up shingle and sand so as to make some places shallow, and islands are frequently formed, by which it would be possible to jump the Also in ploughing by the water side, when the plough strikes banks of shingle formerly thrown up by the river but now covered with arable soil, they speak of being down to 'the garth' (A M), Twenty years ago the word 'garth' was in common use [on the lower Dee] among the net fishers, 'floatmen,' ferrymen, and those who frequently foided the river Below the ferry known as 'the inch' at Maryculter there is a well-known ford and whether the river was fordable or not was known by the and whether the river was fordable or not was known by the appearance of a flat stretch of shingle This shingle was called the garth, and one frequently heard the remark 'she [the river] is over the garth to day,' or 'the garth at the inch is in sight to-day' As to crossing a river on garth, that could only be when the river was so small that the water between the pools percolated through the shingle, as one sometimes sees in small streams but never in the Dee (W J F), Intent to pass fae north to south By ford, or garth, gin sic micht be, Grant Lays (1884) 102, This gallant beastie Alang the garth I'll safely guide, An' lan' ye on the ither side, tb 103

GIBB, sb Sc Obs In phr Rob Gibb's contract, a toast expressive of mere friend when we drukt to our friend.

Sc An expression often used when we drink to our friend.

Kelly  $P_{tov}$  (1721) 283, James V had an excellent [fool] in Rob Gibb, who was a fellow of much humour and diollery, and by all accounts a wise fool In order to amuse the king, and in some measure contribute to relieve him from the numerous solicitations which he saw added to his distress, Rob offered that, if the king would allow him to personate his majesty on the day appointed for answering the claimants, he would satisfy them all This being agreed to, Rob took the chair of state in the audience room He then addressed them, but in place of that remunera-tion which they expected, he offered himself as an example for their imitation 'I have served,' said he, 'the king the best part of my life without fee or reward, out of stark luif and kindness, a principle I would seriously recommend to you all to carry home with you and adopt' This put them all in good humour, and Rob gained his end, Trans Soc Antiq II pt 1 48-50 (JAM) fine on the negligent farmer.

Per. An old custom takes place in this parish, called Gool-riding. The lands of Cargill were formerly so very much over-run by a weed with a yellow flower that grows among the corns, especially in wet seasons, called Gools, and which had the most pernicious effects, not only upon the corns while growing, but also in preventing their 'winning' when cut down, that it was found absolutely ing their 'winning' when cut down, that it was found absolutely necessary to adopt some effectual method of extirpating it altogether. Accordingly... an act of the baron-court was passed,.. imposing a fine of 3s. 4d. or a wedder sheep, on the tenants, for every stock of gool that should be found growing among their corns at a particular day, and certain persons stilled 'gool-riders,' were appointed to ride through the fields, search for gool, and carry the law into execution when they discovered it. Though the fine of a wedder sheep is now commuted, and reduced to a id sterling, the practice of gool-riding is still kept up, and the fine rigidly exacted, Statist.

'That cow's ten 'ear owd—fur I counted seven or eight grayns in 'er 'orn' As it is the practice of dishonest cattle-dealers to file out the grains or rings in a cow's horn, in order to make her appear younger than she is; so, a woman, who by artificial means tries to give herself a more youthful appearance, is said to 'tak' the grayns out'n 'er 'orns.'

Hence Graining in the horn, phr., see below.

A ring appears on a cow's horn with every calf she has after the first one; this is called 'graynin' i' the 'orn.' Hence, by metaphor, a woman waxing in years is said to be 'graynin' i' the 'orn.' GRAINSHIRE, GRAINTAL., GRAINTED, see Gain-

Cor. Cornish sailors often speak of the 'Green,' which they frequently call 'Fiddler's Green' amongst themselves. They described this place as an 'Isle of the Blest' in which honest tars, after...this life...enjoy... bliss with...old comrades and favourite fair ones. In orchards of fruit, ever ripe, they are entertained with music, dancing, and everything else in which they delighted in their lifetime, Flk Lore Rec (1881) IV 198.

16. Obs. To make green, cause to become green.

Ess 1 Colchester oysters were frequently distinguished by a green tinge. In order to green the oysters, they were put into pits about a feet deep, in the salt marshes, which are overflowed only at spring-tides, to which they have sluices, and let out the salt water until it is about a foot and a half deep. These pits, from some quality in the soil, will become green, and communicate their colour to the oysters that are put in them. In 4 or 5 days, though colour to the oysters that are put in them, in 4 or 5 days, though they commonly let them continue there 6 weeks or 2 months, in which time they will be a dark green. This distinction of Colchester from other oysters is rapidly wearing away; indeed, it may be said that few or none of them are now ever greened. See Cromwell's Hist. Colchester, 293.

Hence Greening-pits, sb. pl. pits in which oysters were formerly put to cause them to become green. 2b.

It is gen, bought from itinerant vendors. Outside almost every farmhouse backdoor is a slopstone—a flag set up on brick pillars—and on this may generally be seen a lump of greet, a smooth round paving stone for pounding it, and a wisp of straw very ingeniously plaited into a scrubber. The scrubber is first dipped into water, platted into a scrubber. The scrubber is first dipped into water, then into the greet, and the vessel-cleaner works at the tubs with a will, and gets them to a high degree of cleanliness; Chs.3, s Chs.1

The institution survives in the Christmas 'sword-dancers,' and in the juvenile tragedy, still performed by extemporized troops of lads in the country villages at Christmas-These little companies of boys go from house to house and enter the door without knocking or any form of announcement. The householder is startled by the apparition of a guizer in his room, who announces himself as King Christmas and speaks the prologue. He finishes by introducing a valuant knight, when enter second guizer. The valiant knight repeats his lines, but is interrupted by a rival,—guizer number three—who abruptly rushes in. A combat ensues, and the last emrant is slam with the wooden lath of his adversary. A doctor then opportunely advances from the outer passage and effects a miraculous resurrection of the slain one. After this, a grotesque guizer, or 'betty,' presents himself and speaks the epilogue, appealing to the generosity of the audience as he goes round with the hat. The guizers then all join in chorus and exeunt (R.O.H.); Nhb.¹ Dur. People, usually children, who go about on Christmas Eve, singing, wearing masks, or otherwise disguised (A.B), Dur.
